I feel that you can ask without giving any attempt whatsoever and still accepted answer. The reason I felt this is we were asking a question "what is the best/appropriate time to initiate SQL query", yet the answer is: "If your query is a SQL statement (a SELECT, a UPDATE, an INSERT, etc), then the best time is just before or after the data is modified; for example before UPDATE or after SELECT." I personally feel that this would not be a good answer, but nobody seemed to call that out as such. A: There is a time and a place for everything... The place for this question is the backlog, or the questions where there is no concrete answer to be found, so nobody can add a canned answer. You might argue that this question belongs in "Get the best practices and implementation of SQL statements" questions, where another question was recently asked "What is the best time to initiate a SQL statement?", but you will always receive an answer there that will be compared with every other answer to that question. If you go the route of adding a comment to that question, nobody will receive notification of it (aside from the people who recently voted to accept your answer). If somebody comes across your answer in the future, they might be disheartened by the fact that nobody else is upvoting it and might chose to upvote another answer to get others on the bandwagon. A moment of silence. An emotional moment for a seven-year-old boy in severe stomach pain. A 82138339de
