Q: How to define a global constant that doesn't get "hijacked" by templates? I have a template class that may not be used by child classes, so I can not use the template keyword to define my const function in header files. For example: `template const T MyConst(T* myArray, int myLength) { return myArray[myLength]; }` From reading online, I understand that I could use it like so: `template const T& MyConst(T* myArray, int myLength) { return MyConst(*myArray, myLength); }` But this will give me a compilation error in client code if I do so
