What's new:

Predictors of outcome of people who self-injure in regional support services. This study aimed to help clinicians to identify predictors of social outcome of persons who self-injure, from the perspectives of two experienced cases managers from regional support services. Self-injurers referred to one of the authors worked from this case study were asked to complete the self-injuring behaviour assessment schedule (SIBAS; Oades, 1994, 1996), administered by interview by one of the authors to 26 persons at an assessment and then again four months later. An average of 0.5 years had passed between the original assessment and repeat interview. Interviews were audiotaped and carers and service providers were asked to answer a 'Client's Social Outcome' questionnaire, designed for this study, based on evaluation of SIBAS interview data and the previous literature. Responses from carers were compared for predictors of social outcome and related to available data from SIBAS and the results of SIBAS. Overall, SIBAS was rated highly for its reliability and internal consistency and the correlation between patterns on the SIBAS were high. Marital status and the number of years since the first self-injury was strongly and negatively correlated with an increase in social outcome, while family history of self-injury, number of previous self-injuries and self-harming behaviour were positively correlated. A range of potential predictors of outcome can be identified from the SIBAS. Is Quantum Mechanics Over? - nickolai ===== Diederich "At a faster rate than you can likely imagine." I'm no mathematician, but this story appears to be divorced from any idea of what it would take to (actually) solve the "hard problems" of quantum mechanics. For example, an electron is now considered to be a point charge, rather than an extended object. This removes the potential problem of electrons in the vicinity of each other being 'leaking information', as they are now basically the same thing, separated by a narrow tunneling distance rather than a wide tunneling distance. The same distance looks wide or narrow, depending on whether you are talking about a particle (which is assumed to be a point, at all times)
