T-cell reactivity induced by B-cell chronic lymphocytic leukemia cells and/or their supernatants. B-cell chronic lymphocytic leukemia (B-CLL) is a leukemia characterized by accumulations of neoplastic B-cells in the peripheral blood, lymph nodes, spleen and bone marrow. B-CLL cells can proliferate without inducing clonal expansion of peripheral T-cells. The mechanism involved in their proliferation has been partially elucidated. In the present study, we investigated the capacity of B-CLL cells to induce T-cell proliferation. B-CLL cells obtained from B-CLL patients showed a proliferative potential comparable to that of normal peripheral blood mononuclear cells (PBMC), especially in the presence of exogenous interleukin (IL)-2. The capacity of B-CLL cells to induce T-cell proliferation was strictly dependent on the nature of the B-CLL cell microenvironment. In addition, we showed that B-CLL cell-mediated T-cell proliferation was also induced by factors constitutively secreted by B-CLL cells but not by those released into culture medium. These data indicate that B-CLL cells stimulate T-cells through a direct contact mechanism that involves T-cell-microenvironment interactions.

Q: How to properly add php code to html file? I have a website which is coded in asp. The primary issue I need to correct is that the php is getting treated like javascript. As an example: I want to add this into my file: "`method="get">`" But what actually shows up on the page is this: If I try to re-write the code like this: "`method="get">`" Then I get this error: Parse error: syntax error, unexpected ';' Which makes sense because I'm trying to send the php code as javascript to the form, or did I do it wrong? A: the code you are talking about is what is called server side include. You may not need it. After all, you do need to use javascript for showing dynamic content. But if it's What's New In?

While many of us are taking a well-deserved break from our books and our computers, others — including the creators and editors of some of the internet's most popular websites — are hard at work trying to find just the right tweet to bring on the next Trump scandal. Over the weekend, for instance, it seemed like most of the internet was making the case that Donald Trump Sr. did not actually put those infamous "FAKE NEWS!" chyron stickers on page two of the 1989 Forbes issue listing Donald's estimated $200 million-plus net worth. (That's right, the disputed stickers, pictured below, ran atop the "billionaires" portion of the magazine's cover.) As noted by a Daily Dot report from early Monday, the week prior to the 1989 Forbes publishing deadline, Donald's father — the man who's officially credited with starting the Trump media empire — did indeed hire an advertising company to design sticker template ads for six Donald Trump-branded casinos, as well as a miniature version to be used on the pockets of the coats hung up outside the Trump Tower home of Trump Sr. That tidbit alone is interesting, but it gets even more amusing when you consider that, during a period of time when Trump was winning the New York property owner's primary, Trump Sr.'s campaign was reportedly seeking funds from Trump's father so he could put together a "special ad" featuring Donald's own byline "verbatim and in his own words." Take a look at the ads from the Deschutes Plaza Casino, the Trump Castle Hotel, Trump's Casino at Atlantic City, and Trump's Castle Casino, which showcase Trump and his voice as the highlighted text of the ads — with the 1987 Teen People cover photoshopped in as a sort of style guide to inform the public what the ads looked like when they were originally published. (The image at the top of this post is the product of a fun, anonymous Photoshop experiment of our own.) According to the photograph in the Trump file at the New York Times, the ad called for Trump to be photographed "verbatim." There's even a coffee cup sitting on his desk. His name is even given as "Donald Trump." But most interestingly, this ads are written by a five-year-old girl named Olivia Fordham. In a long interview with the New York Times, Olivia explained that she wrote the piece at the behest of her father, Trump Sr., who told her that he wanted the
