Note In this book, I use the term _layer_ to mean a document or photo. This does not mean that there are _layers_ in the traditional sense, in that a layer is a thing that you can show or hide from the photo or document by turning on or off the visibility feature. Instead, a layer is simply a way to represent a document or photo on a computer screen. The layers in this book are the same layers that have been previously discussed in the book. To access the controls in Photoshop or a program like Photoshop, you must open a document, go to the View menu, and select View. Alternatively, you can press the Control key+Z. To close the image, select File | Close.

Q: What is the difference between not setting AutoGenerateColumns, AutoGenerateEditForm, AutoGenerateDeleteButton and AutoGenerateEditButton? My application consists of a form with a combobox bound to a data source and a grid view. The application runs well, but AutoGenerateColumns, AutoGenerateEditForm, AutoGenerateDeleteButton and AutoGenerateEditButton are not set, but they are by default set in the page editor. I have noticed that when AutoGenerateColumns, AutoGenerateEditForm, AutoGenerateDeleteButton and AutoGenerateEditButton are NOT set, the grid view fills out columns and rows automatically based on the number of rows in the data source, but when they are set, the grid view leaves out the columns and rows when the number of rows in the data source is 0. This is the form with the combobox and gridview. This is the form without the combobox and grid view. A: These four properties are only applicable to HTML pages, not VB.Net. AutoGenerateColumns AutoGenerateEditForm AutoGenerateDeleteButton AutoGenerateEditButton They are used to control how the underlying data control is created, e.g. a GridView control. If these properties are not set, then the GridView control is created "manually", i.e. it needs to be manually created by the designer. If these properties are set, then the GridView control is created "automatically" by the designer.
